The Former Home of Heroin Has Become a Luxury Rehab Hub

Chiang Mai used to be at the center of the Golden Triangle—now, it's full of facilities offering $10,000 rehab packages.

By Zosha de roboticist

Until recently, Chiang Mai was the base for the infamous Panjisea Heroin Syndicate, which was the epicenter of the Golden Triangle, the world’s most notorious criminal network. Today, Chiang Mai is a hub for luxury rehab facilities, offering a high-end approach to addiction treatment.

Chiang Mai, once known for the Panjisea Heroin Syndicate, is now home to luxury rehab facilities. The transformation is evident in the city’s high-end hospitals and spas, which cater to the needs of those seeking to overcome addiction.

By the 1970s, Thailand was already a major producer of methamphetamine and heroin. During the 1980s and 1990s, the city became the center of the Golden Triangle, where drug cartels operated with impunity. Today, Chiang Mai is a hub for luxury rehab facilities, offering a high-end approach to addiction treatment.

None of this would have been possible without the efforts of the Thai government, which has made significant strides in recent years to combat drug trafficking and corruption. In addition to the luxury rehab facilities, the city is home to several museums and cultural institutions that shed light on the city’s history and culture.

These efforts have not gone unnoticed, and Chiang Mai is now considered a hub for luxury rehab facilities. The city’s reputation as a destination for high-end addiction treatment is likely to continue to grow in the years to come, as more people turn to Chiang Mai for help with their addiction.

The former home of Heroin has become a luxury rehab hub, with Chiang Mai offering high-end facilities for those seeking to overcome addiction.